Dear Hiring Manager,

I have always believed that the most effective work is done when a commitment to integrity is paired with a genuine desire to see the whole team succeed. Throughout my career, most recently as a Product Information Analyst at Grainger, I have focused on delivering high-quality results while ensuring that the people around me have the tools and resources they need to grow.

In my current role, I manage multiple concurrent projects with a combined value of approximately $148 million. I've found that my approach to this work usually comes down to being a reliable partner to my stakeholders and finding practical ways to improve our processes. Helping reduce the time it takes or by finding more efficient ways of completing the work. For example, by integrating AI into our supplier research, I was able to reduce task completion time by 40%. This wasn't just an efficiency win; it allowed our team to focus on more meaningful, data-driven action plans that directly impacted our customers and stakeholders.

Beyond the technical side of my work, I find the most fulfillment in supporting the professional development of others. I've made it a priority to build resources that help my colleagues, such as:

- Facilitating "Lunch-&-Learn" sessions to help leaders improve their team recognition and support strategies.
- Redesigning onboarding programs that cut down the time it takes for new hires to feel confident in their roles by an average of 60 days.
- Developing a "candidate bench" strategy to help my department identify and prepare internal talent for future opportunities.

This focus on being a resource for others was originally shaped during my time in the Army National Guard. Serving as a Chaplain's Assistant taught me how to handle sensitive situations with care and how to act as a trusted liaison between leadership and staff. I view my recent experience in data and project management as the perfect complement to that foundation—allowing me to bring a highly analytical, evidence-based approach to the way we manage and support our people.

I am looking for the opportunity to bring this balanced approach to your organization, where I can contribute to your goals while helping the team around me reach their full potential.

Sincerely,

Evin Strand